John Challice is Vice-President and Publisher of the Higher Education Division of Oxford University Press Inc, a not-for-profit academic and educational publisher based in New York City. Prior to joining OUP, he worked for Pearson/Prentice Hall as the Editor in Chief of Science, where he oversaw one of the largest educational science publishing programs in the world. Earlier in his career, he founded and ran a successful trade publishing company that produced a number of national best-sellers.

John's academic background is in biochemistry and chemistry, and his graduate degree is from the University of Toronto. He is an enthusiastic teacher, and taught courses in Communication Studies at the University of Calgary for four years. His committee work includes a stint as the Alberta Provincial representative to the Canadian Federal Government’s Small Business Advisory Committee. He is a published author and science journalist, and was a regular contributor to the Science and Technology section of The Economist for many years.
