On the Road to Justice: Indigenous Communities and the Law in Late Colonial-Andes

By Victor Maque, PhD
University of Notre Dame

The Late-Colonial Andes is mostly known as a tumultuous conjuncture of dramatic increase of colonial demands, massive Indigenous insurrections, and brutal colonial repression. The prominent narrative has been that despite indigenous communities’ dramatic struggles the colonial government maintained its hegemony. This view ignores the less prominent and long term interventions of the indigenous communities from below shaping the outcomes at local and regional levels. For instance, there was a clear increase of litigation and collective mobilizations against local authorities including their own caciques (ethnic leaders). These Indigenous communities used the colonial legal system fervently, particularly revealing were their actions outside of the formal legal proceedings, on the larger social drama of the litigations. In this presentation I argue that these Indigenous communities perceived their litigations as a part of a more comprehensive process, as part of their larger political struggles for autonomy and good governance.

About the presenter:
Dr. Maque is a candidate for the Tecumseh Postdoctoral appointment 2017-2018. He holds a current appointment at the Kellogg Institute for International Studies of the University of Notre Dame. He is also an honorary visiting faculty member at the Universidad Nacional del Altiplano, at Puno, Perú and the University of the Nouvelle Grand Anse, Haiti. His research interests include indigenous movements and popular sectors in Colonial and Post-Colonial Southern Andes. He examines the politics, language, and cultures of these Andean communities.
