Major of the month: Soil and Water Sciences

Are you interested in environmental science and conservation? Do you enjoy travel, being outdoors, and doing hands-on work? If so, consider majoring in Soil and Water Sciences! This broad major in the College of Agriculture provides you with knowledge in biology, chemistry, soils, hydrology, and natural ecology, which can lead to a variety of environmental careers —from being a naturalist doing environmental research to being a policymaker or planner for local, state, and federal governments. Soil and water scientists work on the front lines to provide data and plan solutions in water conservation, sustainability, the restoration of ecosystems, and much more. Occupations typically involve a mixture of field work, such as surveying and collecting samples, laboratory analysis, as well as office work involving compiling data and writing reports. This is a great option for students seeking an environmentally-oriented major with a strong emphasis in science.
