Students who qualify as InterFuture Scholars join a group of outstanding, imaginative undergraduates from around the United States who have the remarkable opportunity to design and carry out a personalized cross-cultural research project.

InterFuture Scholars receive preparatory training to design and engage in original, independent, research abroad in IF locales of their choice. After performing a pilot study in their home community, they typically travel abroad to one country during the second semester of their junior year and a second country during the summer between junior and senior year. Upon returning, they complete a three-country comparative thesis based on their cross-cultural research— for a total of a year or more of Purdue credit. Each research project is designed to reflect the participants’ diverse interests and can be geared towards specific career goals.
